Alexandrite

Alexandrite is a phenomenal variety of Chrysoberyl that changes colors in different light sources. Alexandrite was discovered in Russia in 1834 and was named in honor of Tsar Alexander. Subsequent discoveries in Brazil and Sri Lanka have provided additional supplies of this scarce gemstone. The unique color changing characteristics of Alexandrite make it one of the most unique and valuable gemstones.

Golden Beryl

These bright yellow Gemstones are also known as Heliodor from the Greek helios, meaning the Sun. Golden Beryl has a Mohs hardness of 8. The presence of iron creates a vivid true yellow to brilliant gold color. Our faceted Gems are transparent and well cut, mined from primarily Brazil and Africa.

ROUGH GEMSTONES

Our rough crystals are terrific for faceting or cabbing, and they can be used in craft projects. All of the crystals are more striking in color when wet. That's why some of our clients have used them in their aquariums and in the bottom of vases. The Corundum rough from Madagascar is opaque and of obscure quality. The pieces range between .25" and 1" in length. Some pieces exhibit the six-sided crystal shape of Corundum. The opaque Brazilian Emerald pieces of rough are .25" to 1+" in length. Our Mexican Opal rough in Rhyolite is in shades of red, orange and yellow. The rough pieces range from 2' to 2.75" long. Each assortment is packaged in a transparent bag.

Bixbite

Red Beryl or Bixbite belongs to the same family of gemstones as Emerald and Aquamarine. Some gem dealers sell Red Beryl as American Red Emerald. Red Beryl is actually much more rare than Emerald and is only found in the remote Wah Wah mountains of western Utah. This true American rarity is worthy of owning and wearing.
